OSCAR WILDE.

A Pleasant Chat with the Aesthete.

His Impression of America and Her People and Poets.

The Courtesy of His Audiences.

His Peculiar Dress the Coming Thing in the Fashionable World.

Our reporter called upon Mr. Oscar Wilde on Monday and was received by the distinguished aesthete with characteristic courtesy. Mr. Wilde, speaking of his American experiences with the utmost candor.

No part of America it appeared as struck Mr. Wilde so favorably as California, but as he said, "I have still to see Colorado." Whatever may be the effect of Denver and Leadville, it is at present certain that San Francisco and the west coast have captivated the poet, for Mr. Wilde intends to return there next year with a party of friends, "in the capacity," as he described it, "of a private gentleman traveling for his own amusement and not as a public lecturer condemned to go on the platform at every place he stops."

Of the results of his tour, financially, the apostle of art decoration spoke very contentedly, and proposed devoting a portion of the proceeds to a lengthened visit to Venice, and a leisurely study of Italy.

But it was when he came to speak of his reception by the American public that Mr. Wilde was most interesting. "I am," he said, "most and more astonished and pleased every time I lecture at the courtesy with which I am received by my audiences. Everybody, they say, laughs at me, and says I am a fraud, yet not only do they fill all my places I choose to lecture in, but they sit out all I have to say with surprising good humor and patience. I am quite conscious that much of what I say may be annoying, but after all I came to America to say it and so long as audiences with such forbearance and good breeding allow me to strut my brief hour upon the stage, I should be singularly stupid not to take advantage of the opportunities given me of trotting out my hobbies. I have no doubt that to-night there will be many people present, perhaps even most of them, who, after they have seen me and satisfied their curiosity as to my costume and my long hair, would be glad to go away again without sitting through a lecture on a subject that does not interest them; but at the same time I have no doubt whatever that they will, out of pure courtesy, sit it out to the bitter end. Sometimes I am inclined to laugh at this kindness, knowing that my audiences often laugh at me, but I really consider my opportunity so splendid a one for saying what I wish to say, that I only wish my delivery and my language were better than they are. Yes, you are right; my delivery has often been criticized very severely, and I confess it is abominable. But I cannot help it. I have never studied elocution—but I shall when I return to England, probably under Vezin. As for my costume, I have several reasons for it, but the more important are these: that the present evening dress of gentlemen is the most objectionable possible, and then I should be glad to do something towards introducing a better. As it is, the Prince of Wales and some of his friends have already pronounced in favor of the velvet coat, ruffles, knee-breeches and silk hose, and it is quite possible that in another year or so all young England may be dressed as I am. Indeed, in New York, one very charming lady has ordered knee-breeches as de rigueur at her receptions, and New York has cheerfully submitted to her delightful tyranny. But another reason for my wearing this costume is based on a principle, for live poets have principles, and that is that one should do as one preaches. Now Morris, the author of that exquisite Earthly Paradise, is prophetically proclaiming the doctrine of artistic dress as a preliminary to a revival of true art; but he goes about himself in the very shabbiest and ugliest of nineteenth century clothes. I do not agree with this, so that when you call upon me as you do now, you find me dressed in aesthetic colors. My coat is a pearly grey velvet, my necktie Venetian green, and you see that I spread a fur robe over this hideous sofa before I sit down on it. To-night, for the same reason, if you come to the theatre, you will find me in black velvet lined with purple, and wearing the ruffles and seals of the regency."

Mr. Wilde then went on to speak of the American poets, expressing that special preference for Joaquin Miller and Walter Whitman, which he has so often tried to vindicate in opposition to other opinions. For Longfellow, he did not entertain so much reverence for the poet as love for the man. "Longfellow," he said, "was himself a beautiful poem, more beautiful than anything he ever wrote." Emerson's prose he considered poetry; the poetry of certain others he considered prose. But as he said, "Verily, the real poet has not come once in a century." Mr. Wilde then quoted favorite sketches from Al-drich, Holmes, Lowell and others, showing an intimate acquaintance with American literature that justified his undertaking to criticize it.

Of our novelists he places Howells and James easily first; "indeed," he said, "they are your only two."

Much more that Mr. Wilde said might be of interest to our readers, but our space compels us to be brief. To run up, he appears to be thoroughly satisfied with the financial results of his tour, and more than satisfied with the good taste and courtesy of the audiences that have listened to him, and among the personal friends he has made in America, there are many who have exacted the promise that he will return to the country next year. "And so I will," said Mr. Wilde, "when I have got more to say, and learnt a better style of saying it."

Leavitt's Gigantean Minstrels.

An immense audience assembled last evening to witness the first performance by Leavitt's Gigantean Minstrels. The entertainment was very satisfactory and was listened to with evident pleasure throughout—the applause and laughter being the evidence. The company is a very good one, and the orchestra unusually excellent. The first part contains comic and sentimental songs, with some special instrumental performance. The soloists are Harry Armstrong, William Kellogg, Frank Moran, Arthur Cook, Billy Arlington, Lew Benedict and R. T. Tyrrell, with William Skuse as soloist for a violin passage, Frank Bowles on the cornet and James Blamph on the harp. The part closes with a burlesque on the finale to the opera "Boccaccio." The second part includes acts by Connors and Kelly, Leavitt's Quartette in concerted selections, the Rankins in their musical absurdities. "The American Four," and Bernard Sloan, an imitator of birds. The entertainment closes with "The Mash-I-Got, a burlesque from 'Mascotte,' in which nearly the whole company appear, and was full of most laughable absurdities. The company appears in a matinee this afternoon and repeats the performance to-night.

Serious Accident.

On Tuesday evening, a very serious accident occurred. A 4 year old child of Mr. Nate Grey fell down a flight of stairs at the residence of its parents, and inflicted a most severe cut on the left side of the face, the blood flowing in streams from the wound. Dr. A. G. Fowler was called, and discovered that the temple artery had been divided. When he reached the house the blood had stopped the outflow, and on wiping this away the blood spurted out against the wall. Several persons were present endeavoring to assist the doctor, but on seeing the wound some women fainted, and the men had to leave. The doctor was administering the chloroform, and holding the end of the artery with his instrument when a lady holding a lamp was overcome and gradually began to sink. In the dilemma the doctor was forced to temporarily neglect the patient to save the lamp, and prevent the burning of the house and its inmates. He finally succeeded in tying the artery. The scalp cut caused by the fall was about five inches long, and extended from the hair down the left side of the face to a point below the ear. Another cut, running into the first one, formed the shape of the letter V inverted, and the skin fell down the side of the face. The injury was a frightful one to behold, but not dangerous. It took nearly twenty stitches to remedy the evil.

RUNAWAYS.

A Chapter of Runaway Incidents.

Tuesday was eventful in a runaway sense. About 2 o'clock in the afternoon a team attached to a flour, wagon started to run away on Second South street. It dashed eastward. At the same time Dr. Anderson was coming down First East street, and when he reached Second South street within half a block of his home, he saw the runaway making directly towards him from the west, he going south. He urged his horse forward and passed the corner, but the runaways seemed to follow and make directly for him. He turned in towards the sidewalk, hoping to escape them; but when he had reached a point half way between the corner and the residence of Mr. Reading he was overtaken. The runaways dashed around to the left of his buggy, and tore off the left wheel, wrenched the top off and otherwise injured it. This threw the doctor and his two children out. Miss Hannah, aged about 14, and the little girl both escaped uninjured, but the doctor was thrown further than the rest, and from the fall and shock was rendered insensible. Mr. Henry Harrison, who saw the affair, rushed to the telephone and called up Dr. Fowler. The latter was very busy, but on receiving word that Dr. Anderson had been injured, dismissed his patients and proceeded across the road to Dr. J. M. Benedict's office, and the latter also left his patients and entering into Dr. Benedict's buggy, the two proceeded at once to Dr. Anderson's residence, reaching there four minutes after Dr. Fowler ad received telephonic notification. Dr. Anderson was insensible when they arrived, and remained so for nearly two hours. An examination showed that both sides of his face were badly out, as though he had plowed into the gravel—the left side being particularly bad. It was decided that he had received a severe concussion of the spine, which had rendered him insensible. Other than this and the bruises on the face, it is not known what he sustained any further injuries. When he regained consciousness he complained of great pain from breathing. Dr. Anderson is 59 years old and has lately been in very poor health. Yet while the physicians are not certain as to the the possible results of the occurrence, Royce Reaper and Richmond they entertain strong hopes of his Mower. A view of them will interest you and a trial of them convince you that they are the best in the west and cheapest machines in Utah. Ahe tank near the City Hall, the full line of Rock Island and plow good horses took fright and started down on hand. Ask for circulars and first South street; he endeavored to grasp the lines, and in doing so, fell between the shafts, and had it not been for the timely stoppage of the horses he would undoubtedly have been killed.
